Seminar on Health Law and Social Policy

Summary Syllabus

This seminar will explore the intersections of health care, law, politics, and ethics in the U.S. in the 21st Century. We will meet in Vanderbilt Hall, Room 202, on Wednesdays from 6:00 to 8:00, beginning Wednesday, August 31, 2011. Each discussion will be led by Sylvia A. Law and, most weeks, another person from a different discipline and perspective.

We will address four central themes: 1) the consequences that flow from characterizing an issue as social, medical, ethical, economic, scientific, religious or legal, 2) the role of rights, and the complexity of constructing rules and enforcement mechanisms, 3) consideration whether policy is set or money raised at the federal, state, local, professional, family or individual level, 4) the pervasive influences of class, race and gender.

This is a preliminary listing of topics, readings and leaders.

August 31, 2011. The historic roots of the organization of health care and health care financing in the United States. Why did we make the choices we did?

Paul Starr, The Social Transformation of American Medicine (1982). [pp. 102-112 (licensing). 112-127 (medical education). 145-147, 154-169, 177-179 (hospitals). 295-320 (the Blues and organized labor), 367-370 (Medicare and Medicaid).]

The book is on reserve in the library. Or you could order your own copy, used, from Amazon.

Optional reading.

T. R. Reid, The Healing of America (2009). Both book and PBS Documentary on reserve in library.

September 14, 2011. Access and Money. The crisis confronting the uninsured, Medicaid, Medicare, employers, and hospitals.

The U.S. spends more on medical care than any other nation, yet large and growing numbers of people living in the U.S. (citizens and non-citizens) have no health insurance. Since World War II, most private insurance has been based on employment. However, employment based insurance has decreased in recent decades. Common strategies to address this problem include expanding existing sources of health insurance from individuals, employers and state and local governments. Every source of insurance coverage pushes back. We rely on hospitals to provide care for people in emergent need. The cost of that care is passed on to people with insurance: the cost of insurance goes up, and, as a result, the number of people who can afford insurance decreases. Apart from this vicious circle, access to good quality health care depends on factors other than insurance coverage.

September 21, 2011. Quality of Care: The Basics.

The United States has an unparalleled capacity to provide medical care to save lives and promote well-being. However, it is now widely understood that our medical care system often fails to deliver on its potential, and indeed causes preventable injuries. This class begins an exploration of the complex relationship between medical malpractice litigation and quality of care. The incidence of common medical procedures varies from area to area, with no demographic explanation.

October 5, 2011. The Patient Protection and Affordable Health Care Act

In 2010 Congress adopted the most comprehensive change in health care financing in the United States since the adoption of Medicaid and Medicare in 1965. This class will explore some of the details of the PPACA, the political process leading to its adoption of the PPACA, alternatives considered and rejected and the currently on-going issues of implementation. Disputes over insurance coverage for abortion were an important part of the political debate and will be considered in a later class.

Medical Education, Physician Supply and Compensation.

The United States is exceptional in that doctors earn more than doctors in any other developed or developing nation. We are also exceptional in demanding long, costly physician training, and assuming that individual students/doctors bear these costs. Our patterns of medical education and compensation produces more surgical specialists, and fewer primary care doctors than other countries. This, in turn, undermines quality of care and increases costs. We depend on foreign medical graduates to staff essential, but less attractive, forms of care.

October 14, Friday, 2-4. Make up class to substitute for the class cancelled on September 28. FH 330. Health Care and Citizenship.

There is wide public support for the ethical proposition that essential medical care, unlike other important goods and services, should be distributed on the basis of medical need, rather than on wealth or social status. While recognizing that this normative proposition is often violated, this class asks to whom it extends. What, if anything, do we as a society, or medicine as a profession, owe to people who are not citizens? What constitutes quality, or even minimally adequate, care for people who are perceived to be different? What are the social and medical costs of excluding some people from medical care?

October 19, 2011. Palliative Care and Choice at the End of Life.

In 1997, a unanimous Supreme Court rejected a constitutional claim that liberty and privacy protect the rights of competent, terminally ill people who seek physician assistance in hastening death. Since 1997, experience under Oregon's Death with Dignity Act has been reassuring and a large majority of Americans support patient choice in these circumstances. In 2009 Washington state followed Oregon, adopting a similar law by referendum, and Montana did so by judicial decision. In 2005, Congress, the courts and the nation confronted related issues in the dispute over Terry Schiavo. This conversation will address the complex issues of choice at the end of life, including palliative care.

Several recent studies document that women and racial minorities receive less medical care and less favorable outcomes for a variety of common conditions including heart disease, cancer and pain. The U.S. health care system seeks to serve people from diverse cultures, many of whom do not speak English. November 2, 2011. The Perennial Nursing Shortage and non-physician Health Care Providers

In the early 20th Century, physicians succeeded, to a remarkable degree, in establishing hegemony over the definition and treatment of illness. Nonetheless, patients need a panoply of other skilled workers to meet their needs. The study of health policy often focuses only on physicians.

This class examines some contemporary issues confronting non-physician providers: nurses, nurse practitioners, physical therapists, psychologists, chiropractors, optometrists, podiatrists and others. Nurses are perennially in short supply and many in the nursing profession question whether the organization of medical care limits nurses ability to provide quality care and find satisfaction in their work. Many non-physician providers question the assumption that their work should always be under physician supervision while others seek access to reimbursement in independent settings.

November 23, 2011. NO CLASS. MADE UP ON OCT. 7.

November 30, 2011. Public Health.

For the most part, the U.S. assumption is that the provision and financing of health care and the education of health care professionals is a non-governmental function, controlled by professional norms, market competition, and governmental regulation, state or federal. Why has the U.S. rejected the assumption that the organization and financing of health care should be a public function? "Public health" represents an exception to this generalization. What defines the appropriate sphere of public health? How has the concept of public health changed over time? We previously looked at this question in the context of HIV. This class explores these questions in the concrete context of the HPV vaccination, drug resistant TB, and obesity. Our focus is on New York City, and on the work of our guest, Professor James Colgrove. Several copies of his recent book EPIDEMIC CITY: THE POLITICS OF PUBLIC HEALTH IN NEW YORK (2011) are on reserve in the library.

The community health center program is one of the few bright spots in our health care landscape, providing high quality care at reasonable cost, reducing racial and linguistic disparities, and responding to community needs. Do these programs provide a model for health care for a broader segment of the population? Why are these programs so often marginal to acute care medicine? How does the organization of medical education promote or undermine these forms of service?
